"Here are settings of poems by Longfellow and Shelley, which are worthy to be associated with these masterpieces. The composer has ideas of his own, which he knows how to use, and he has appreciation of his authors, and sympathy with their tender imaginings. The first of this remarkable group is evidently the production of a cultured mind. In "Good night beloved," the composer has been no less successful, the poem being allied to music as tender and loving as it is engaging. The third song is very slight, but sweet. Shelley's "I fear thy kisses, gentle maiden," is the last, and in many respects the best. The composer seems here thoroughly to have caught the spirit of the poet, and the words appear to illustrate the music quite as much as the music illustrates the words."—The Queen.

"All so full of reposeful beauty, it is difficult to specially praise one in particular."—Illustrated London News.
